

Searching for a Bird and Finding the Interdependent Web

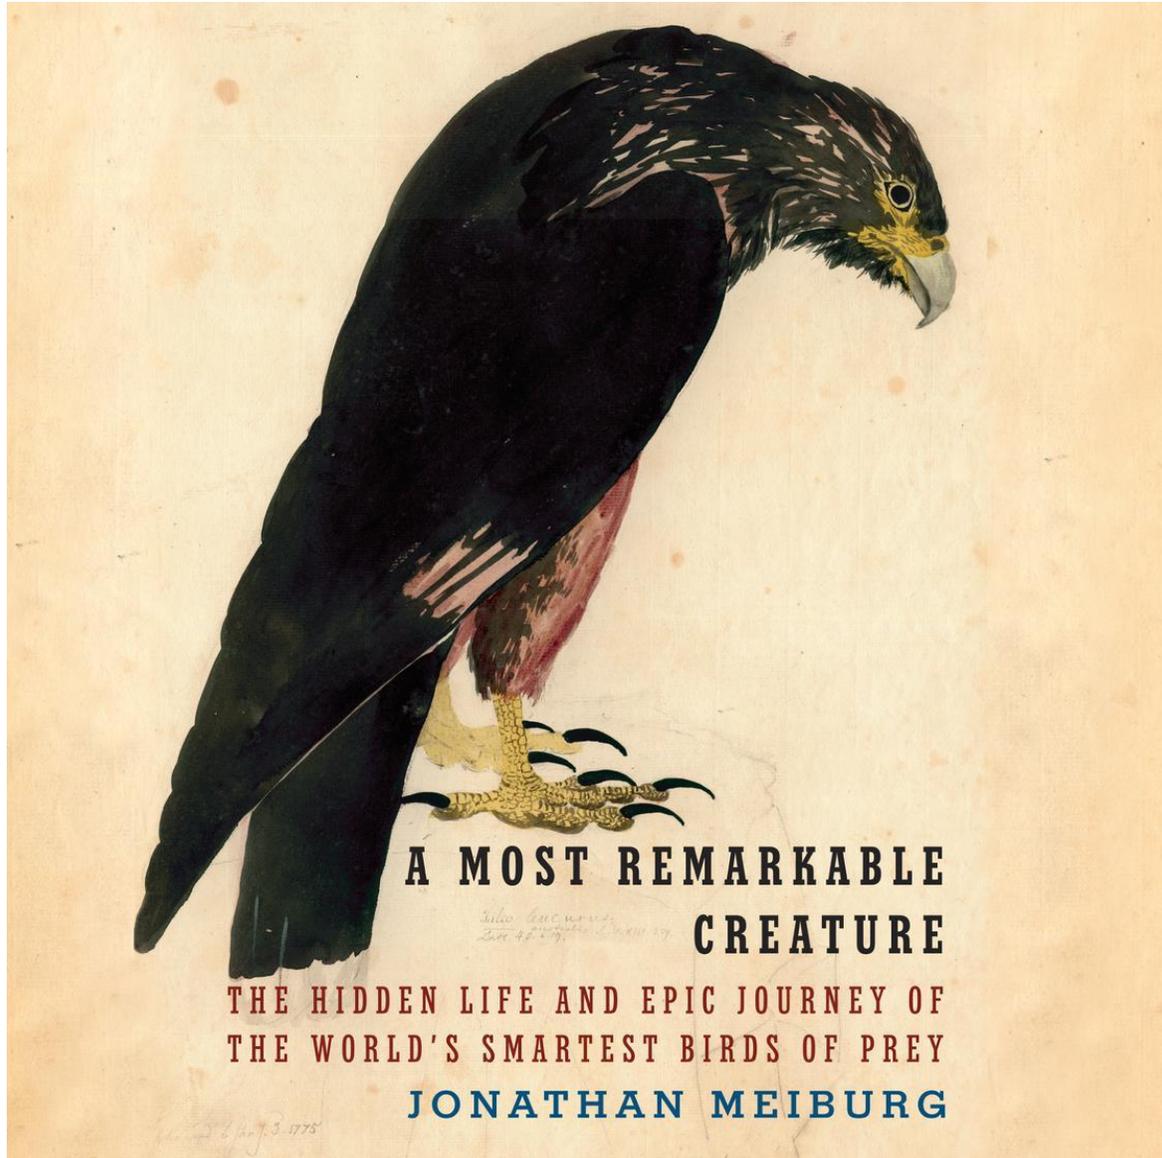

•7th Principle: Respect for the Interdependent Web of All Existence of Which We Are a Part

Except for maps and books, all photos are by Anne or Alana

I was traveling for my usual reasons, out of restlessness and curiosity, to look at places that were new to me. We travel for pleasure, for a door-slamming sense of “I’m outta here,” for a change of air, for edification, for the big vulgar boast of being distant, for the possibility of being transformed, for the voyeuristic romance of gawping at the exotic.

“They are the southernmost birds of prey on Earth, and among the rarest: no more than a few thousand are left, a number only slightly larger than the wild population of giant pandas...”

•“But if you visit them, they refuse to behave like a species on the verge of extinction. They’ll pluck the cap from your head, tug at the zippers on your backpack, and meet your eye with a forthright, impish gaze.”
Meiburg

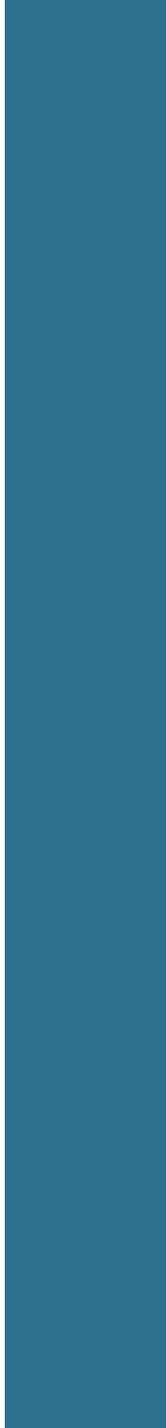

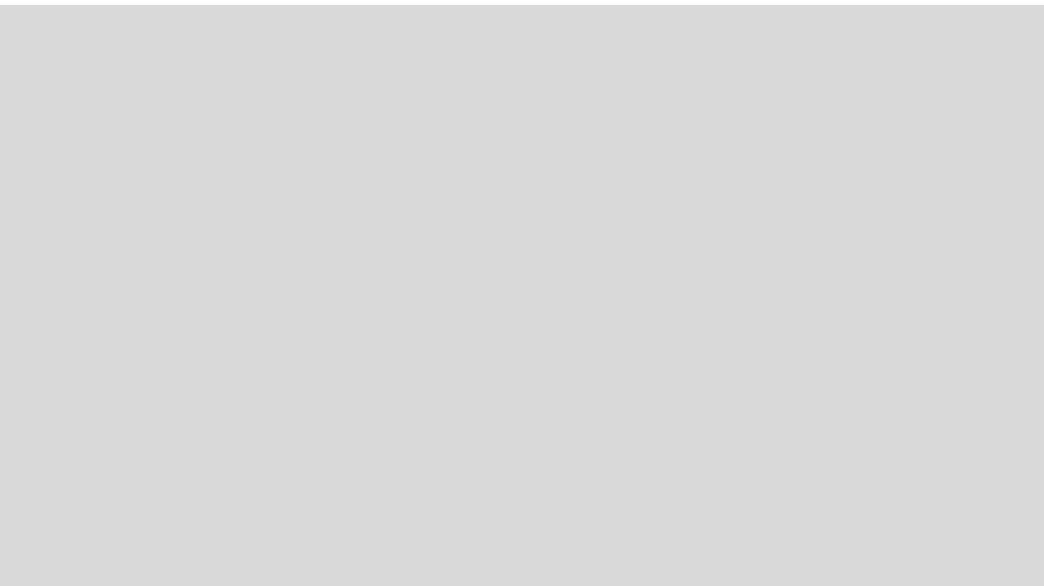

“When I first saw them running toward me at full tilt, I felt a shiver of cognitive dissonance:
Aren't wild animals supposed to run away?”

Meiburg

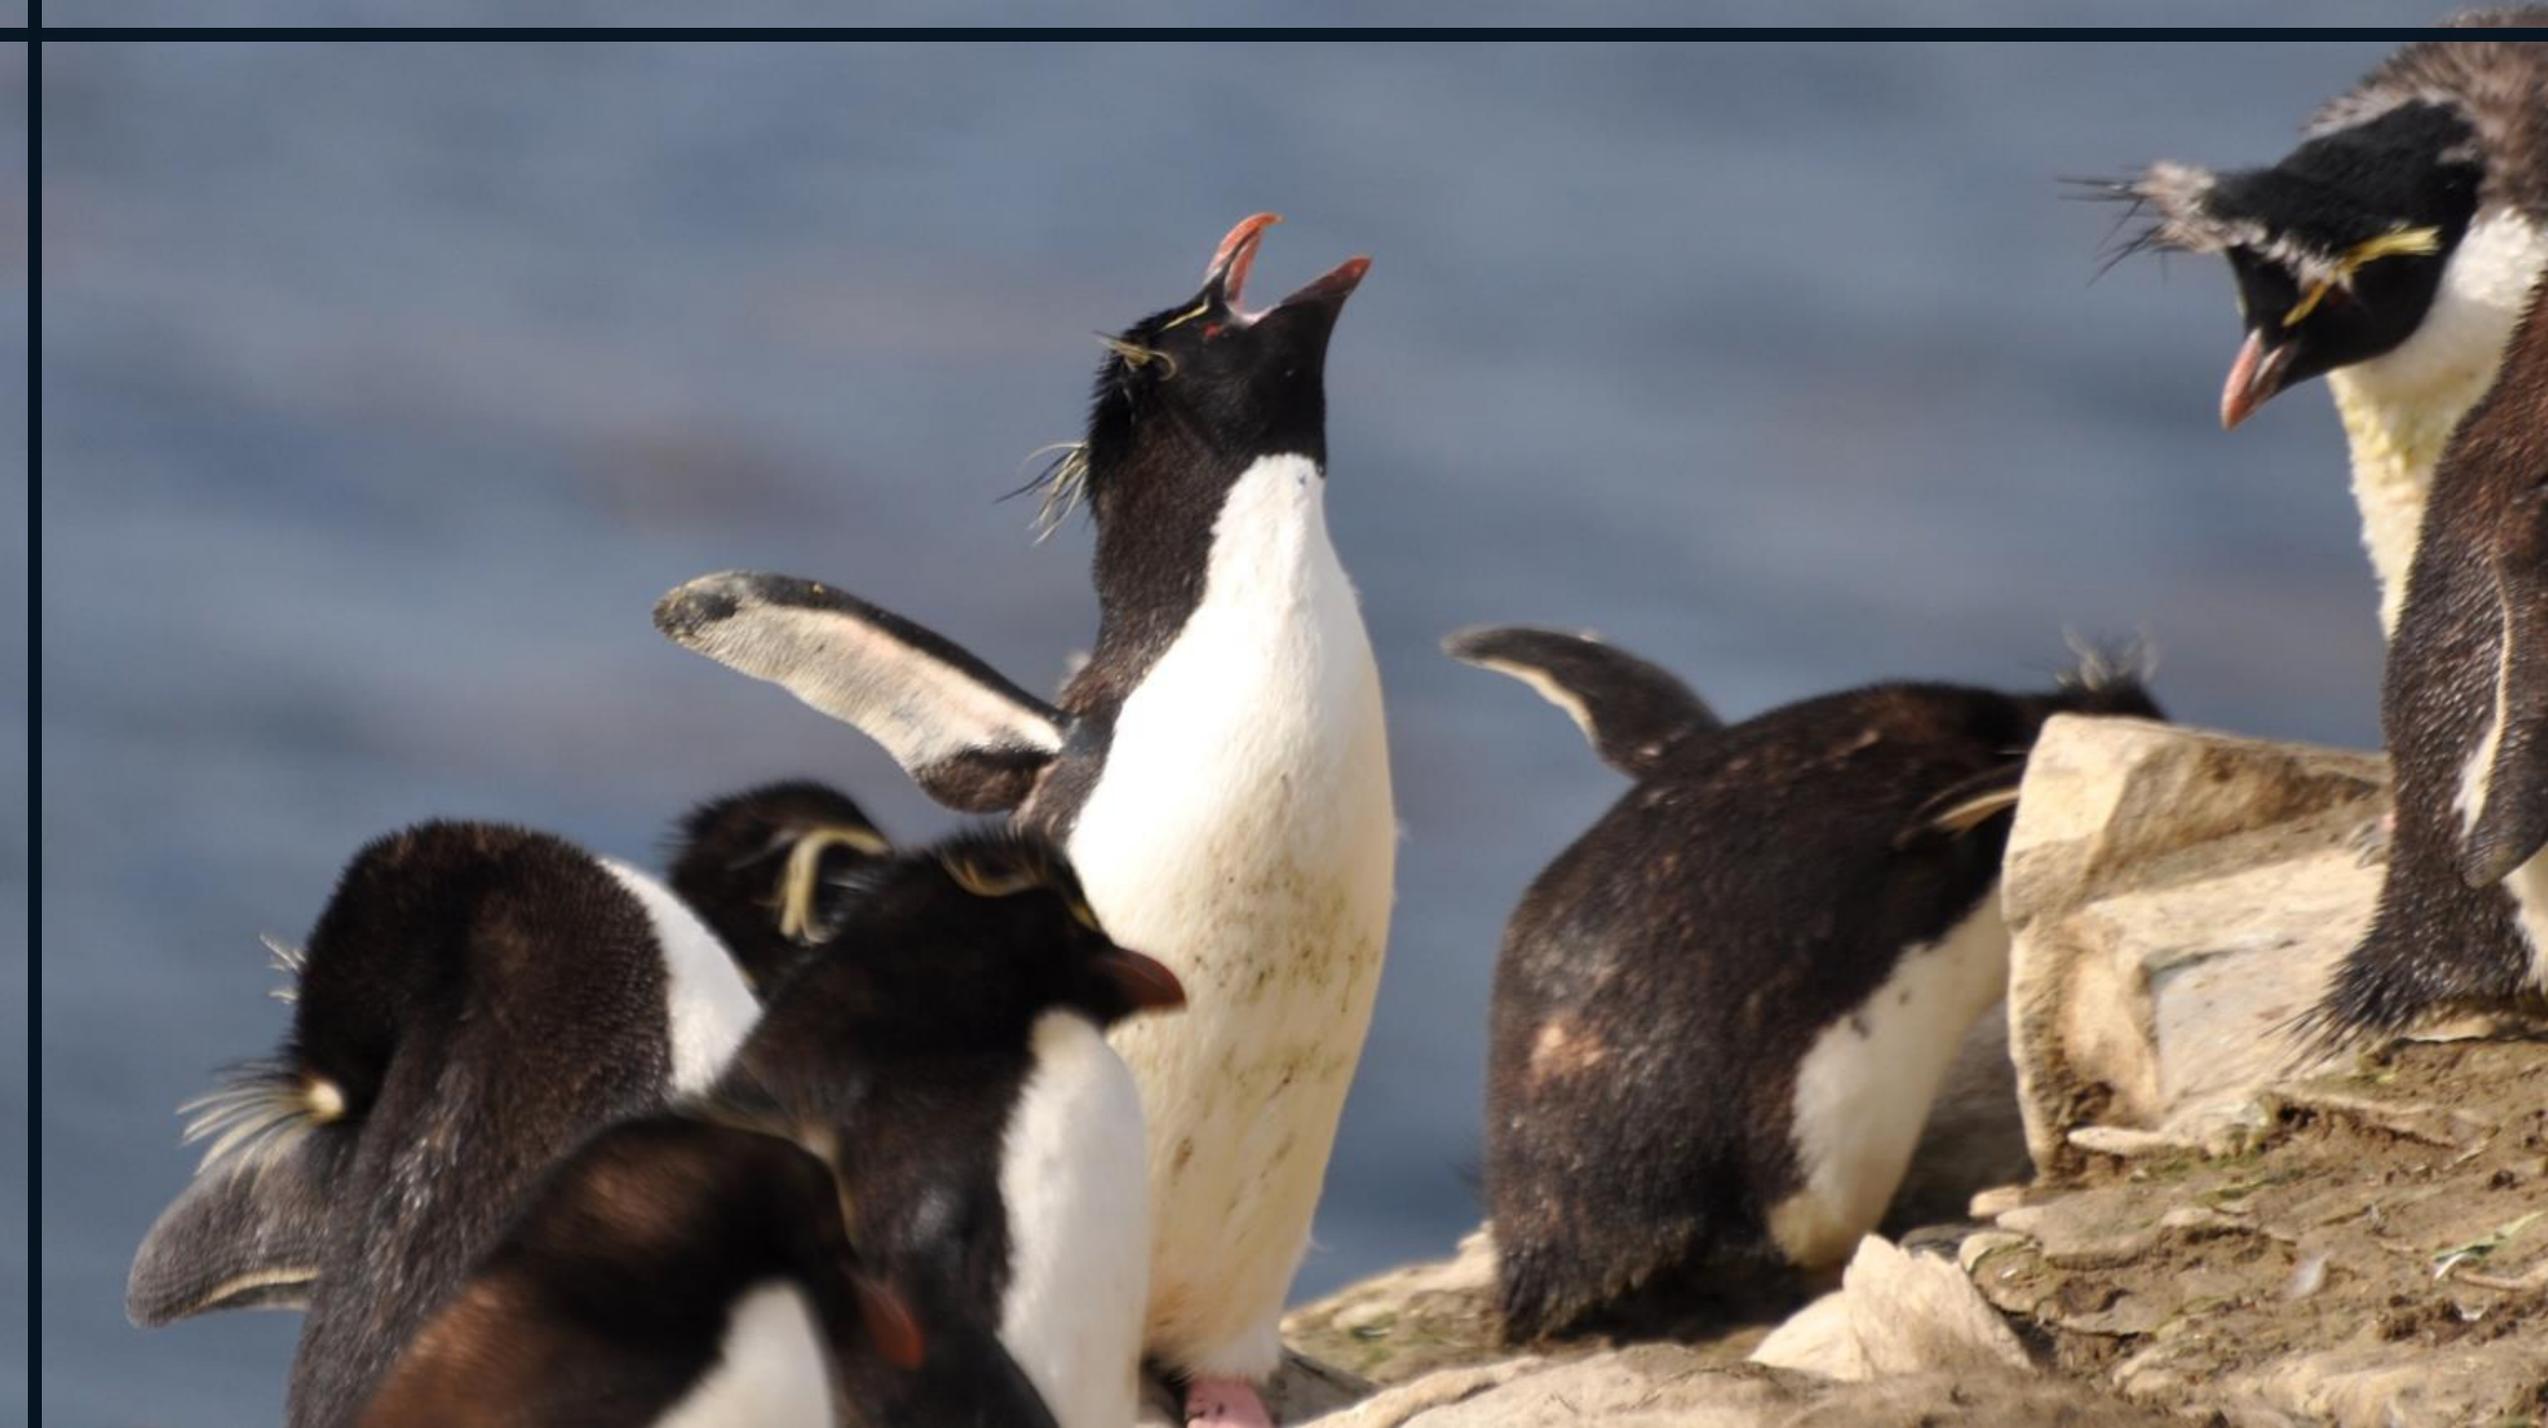

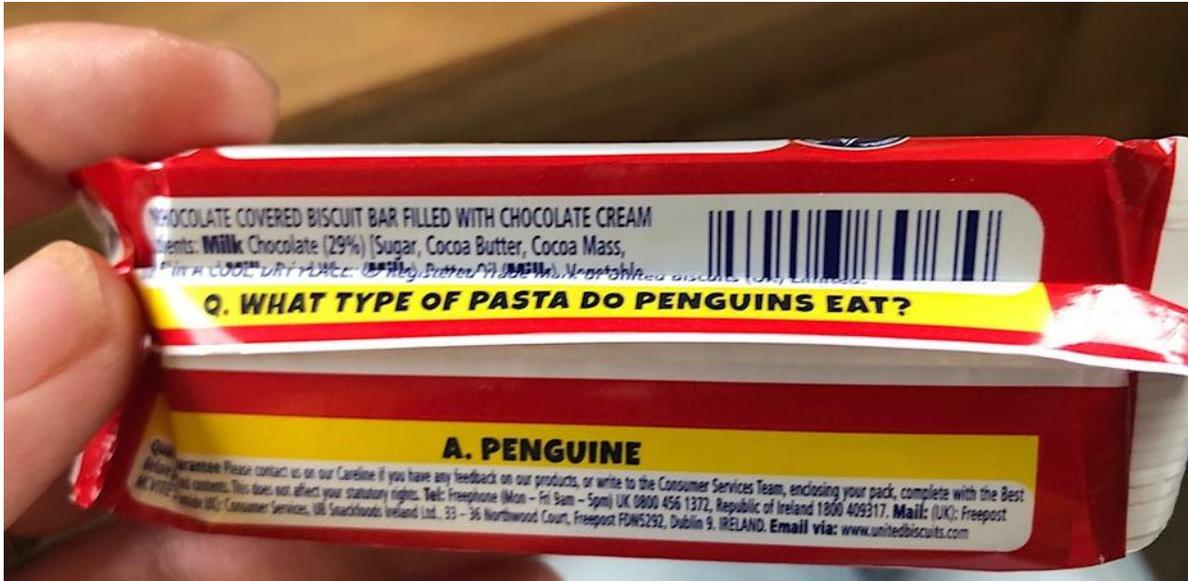

Penguin
footprints!

”Striated caracaras seem disarmingly conscious, and they prod at the turf with their bills and feet, and crane their necks to peer at everything with a keen but slightly dubious interest, as if they’ve just emerged from the Ark and wonder what else the world might have to offer.” Meiburg
